Min Rosk grew up in a small mountain town not far from Ebonhaven, where traders, hunters, and travelers often passed through on their way to larger destinations. The daughter of a blacksmith, she was raised among craftspeople and storytellers, hearing tales of heroes, great battles, and ordinary folk who chose courage when it mattered most. Those stories left a lasting impression on her, though she never imagined she would one day become part of one herself.

As a teenager, Min became apprenticed to Garris Remley, a traveling master glasswright from Da’hal Kempa who restored and created windows for temples, chapels, and cathedrals throughout the region. Under his mentorship, she learned the craft of preserving history through art, helping create and restore works depicting gods, heroes, rulers, victories, and tragedies from ages past. The road suited her surprisingly well, and over the years she developed a reputation as a talented artisan, sketchbook always in hand and pockets often full of colorful glass scraps she couldn't bear to throw away.

While assisting with the restoration of a temple dedicated to Oros al'Calhoon, disaster struck. Separated from her mentor and trapped inside with frightened clergy, worshippers, and children, Min found herself forced to make a choice. Rather than flee, she guided the others to safety and stood alone against the creatures that had breached the sanctuary. Though terrified and untrained for such a fight, she held her ground long enough for everyone else to escape and in doing so, nearly lost her life.

That night, beneath the light of a half-restored window depicting Oros, something changed. The Goddess of Change, Transition, Guidance, and Revelation took notice of the young artisan who had chosen courage over fear and protection over self-preservation. In the silence that followed the battle, Min received a sign of Oros' favor and awoke to powers she had never possessed before. Since then, she has carried both hammer and glaive, creating beauty where she can and defending others when she must.

Today, Min travels the roads of Abryryim as both artisan and cleric, restoring stories of the past while trying to live a story worthy of remembrance herself. She draws inspiration from the heroes and legends she grew up studying, not because they were flawless, but because they chose to stand firm when darkness threatened to overwhelm the light. Through Oros' guidance, she hopes to do the same.
