

Eudora Aetherwyn

House Aetherwyn

Sigil: A silver star suspended within a ring of seven arcane circles.

Motto: "Power Shapes Destiny."

House Aetherwyn is one of the most respected magical families in Windmire. Though not among the Seven Noble Houses, their influence reaches every corner of Windmire. They provide magical services, enchantments, wards, and arcane expertise to the city's great houses while pursuing a long-standing ambition: to one day secure a place among them. For generations House Aetherwyn has believed they are only one marriage, one alliance, or one extraordinary achievement away from joining the Council of Tides.

House Aetherwyn is known for producing gifted spellcasters, and adding to the prestige is an unusual family trait. Every third generation, a sorcerer of extraordinary power is born into House Aetherwyn. Family records tell of legendary ancestors who shaped storms, altered battlefields, and performed magical feats still spoken of centuries later.

When Eudora was born, everyone believed she might be that child. At first, it seemed they were right, but no one could teach her how to control it. From an early age, Eudora's magic was powerful, unpredictable, and frequently disastrous. Private lessons ended with animated furniture, localized weather events, and magical mishaps. While her power impressed everyone, her lack of control worried them.

The comparison to her siblings did not help. Her older brother, Markos, excelled in everything he attempted and quickly became involved in the family's business and political ambitions. Her twin sister, Evelyn, displayed remarkable magical discipline and eventually became a Sea Wizard. Even her younger brother Ashur shows exceptional promise. Eudora alone seemed incapable of meeting expectations.

Eventually she was sent to the Academy of Arcane Studies alongside the children of Windmire's noble and wealthy families. Her parents hoped formal instruction would provide the structure she lacked. At the Academy, she developed a reputation less for academic success and more for accidental chaos. Professors never knew whether a simple spell would work perfectly or create an entirely new problem. There were enough magical accidents that Eudora became something of a campus legend. Rather than fight her reputation, she embraced it. She spent more time socializing than studying, collected an endless supply of ridiculous stories, and somehow graduated despite everyone's uncertainty about how exactly she managed it.

During her second year, after a particularly difficult day, Eudora purchased a crystal pendant from a shopkeeper who promised: "It won't stop the storm, dear. But it might help you remember that the storm belongs to you." Eudora absolutely misunderstood and thought it would magically fix her problems. The necklace never solved her problems, but she has worn it every day since. The crystal glows softly when she channels magic, and her fingers constantly find it. Today it serves as both arcane focus and comfort.

Shortly before graduation, one of Eudora's wild magic surges permanently transformed her hair into a shifting display of vibrant colors. No wizard, mage, alchemist, or magical expert has successfully reversed the effect. Her family considers it embarrassing. Eudora secretly loves it.

Returning home after school proved difficult. Surrounded by accomplished siblings and constant expectations, she increasingly felt like the family disappointment. The only exception was Ashur, who adored her completely and never understood why anyone viewed her as a failure. Eventually House Aetherwyn faced a practical question: what exactly was Eudora supposed to do with her life? No one wanted her handling sensitive magical negotiations. No one trusted her with important enchantment contracts. No one could imagine placing her in a position where a wild surge might embarrass the family in front of the Seven Houses.

Fortunately, an opportunity appeared through the extended family connections of Markos's fiancée. A relic reclamation company in Ebonhaven needed an entry-level employee for their storefront. The job was intended to be simple and safe: catalog inventory, assist customers, and sell relics from behind a counter. Her family was thrilled. Finally, Eudora had a respectable position where she could do minimal damage.

Naturally, that plan didn't last. Strange relics seem drawn to her. Unstable magical artifacts react to her presence. What was meant to be a quiet storefront position is gradually evolving into something far more adventurous. Now, Eudora is setting out on her first relic reclamation expedition, assigned to accompany one of the company's most trusted clients and his adventuring party while investigating the rumored location of the Rod of Saint Fe'tuth—a sacred relic fashioned from the saint's preserved leg bone and encased in gold and silver. Her job is simple: gather information and, if possible, return the relic to Ebonhaven. If experience has taught her anything, however, it's that nothing involving Eudora Aetherwyn ever stays simple for long.

Her entire life is basically:

Everyone: "Let's put Eudora somewhere safe where she can't cause trouble."

Wild Magic: "No."